This interesting photo arrived in my mailbox in May, 2016 and I immediately found it to be a remarkable shot. The woman in the photo was taking selfies of herself and her infant daughter when the third figure—possibly of a young boy?—appeared unexpectedly over her shoulder. Note the semi transparency of the face and what appears to be a grin on the face of the apparition. Additionally, unlike most spirit photos, this individual appears to be posing for the shot much as he would in life.

The woman in the picture didn't notice the figure until she was going through her photo albums on her phone several months later, making getting specifics of the incident difficult. She also claims the house has no prior history of paranormal activity, though she claims to have had paranormal experiences in her past, suggesting that she may be a "sensitive" capable of inadvertently attracting spirits. I also tried repeatedly to contact the woman in the photo in an effort to acquire more information (she was kind enough to provide me her phone number) but I was unable to get more than her answering machine.

In any case, this is one of the better captures that has come my way, and one that does much to confirm the hypothesis that spirits retain much of their prior personality and even the desire to interact with the living even after they are deceased. (Used with permission. All rights reserved.)
